Mayor Ivan Allen, Jr.
Atlanta, Ga.

There's an old saying that "everyman has his price" and I'll be watching your career with much interest to see which niche you fall in when your present term expires----You might even be an Ambassador or something.

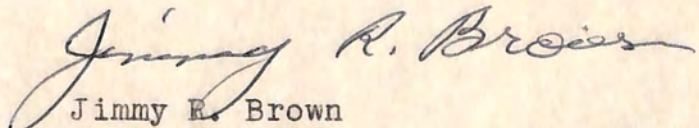

I just about "chucked my breakfast" when I read what a Quisling you turned out to be in Washington several days ago.

No doubt you had already been instrumental in convincing many business establishments that they should "throw the doors open" with the assurance that they would fare much better if they integrated their places of business voluntarily and that it was inevitable anyway.

Now that there isn't the remotest chance of passing this Communistic bill, it really does put you in the vice doesn't it?

I've always enjoyed "seeing worms in vices" and I do hope that the good people of Atlanta see that you stay there unless you agree to crawl back "under the rock" from whence you emigrated originally.

The worst to you.
